Divine Appointments

Happy Friday!

What a week... I just spent a delightful week with one of my longest friends in Key West. She was instrumental in my move to Hollywood and helped me get my first film to learn PR. I've been lucky to have some great relationships. I was able to reminisce on way back with another friend from those days. Working in the entertainment industry was fun and I have some fabulous memories and friends but I left that business to follow my calling to make more of a difference in the world.

Which brings me to Sunday morning. My friends were ready to make breakfast but given the choice, decided to go out. Across from the Banana Cafe, we left to walk off our crepes and saw an art gallery across the street. We were delighted with the wonderful photography of Alan S. Maltz at his gallery, but was particularly drawn to this image of a female Egret ready to take off. It reminded me of the way I felt as I have been readied to have a more public life for phase two of our work.

I bought the image and when going to check out, the woman at the desk said it was titled, "The Calling", to which I found an unexpected surprise that couldn't be more perfect. My reaction caused the woman to sense a story which began an hour conversation on spirituality.

It became apparent that not only the image was purposeful but so was this meeting. I now have new artwork as well as a new friend and client.

She invited us to the Garden Hotel that night for wine and jazz and met more fun and interesting people. It appears that Key West has just taken on more depth for me. I knew at the time of check out from the gallery, that this was a divine appointment and it's expanded from there.

How many of those divine appointments do we really have? Probably more than we realize. We are put in the path of those most purposeful for us to meet. There are times when some situations present themselves more evidently than others but the universe knows who you need meet. We must follow our inspiration, however, in order to meet them.

We can't respond to those inspirations with judgments such as too busy, etc. The excuses we make at times are the very things that block our opportunity. I could have stayed home for breakfast that day for a number of reasons but I was inspired to go and grateful I did. I had fun and new friends to show for it!

To make sure you don't miss those divine appointments, live in the moment and follow your inspiration.

Blessings,

Joy
